Reflection

Throughout the journey of my research, I always had my thesis statement in mind when I wrote and connected it back to my findings. After working on my thesis for a long time since it wasn't very specific. By going on the internet and using my old one to actually get to be specific and brainstorming for a while. I got it to where I could research and argued my point to the full extent. At first, I did have trouble since my question wasn't specific enough/ not arguable. I did encounter trouble finding sources because I got a lot of hits at once, So it was very hard to pick out which one would help with my writing. Some were that were very hard to understand and read. But after the activity, it really helped. Which explained how to read these findings in a way I could understand and explain it. Also, I narrowed it down using the system which helped tremendously. Yes, there were sources I discarded because it wasn't as relevant that I thought to my paper. Also, it was just too confusing and long. Some problems I encountered when analyzing sources were the experiments and solutions cause you had to pay attention to details and there were numbers involved. So it was a lot to retain and see which were some were useful and some weren't. Also, knowing which details the best support my argument cause I had to really analyze them to see which were right for my paper. The sources I ended up using to support my thesis and contribute to my argument were very informational. The sources that supported my thesis actually argued for both sides. Since in the beginning, they weren't biased so it was helpful when getting information. And gave me more advantages to writing my rebuttal. Additionally, I used them for my argument because it had other work. So not only I got one but several to establish my argument and help support my overall thesis statement. It helped contribute to my argument because it helped explain my thoughts. Overall one thing I would change is being a little more specific and concise when applying my thesis to my writing. Also, I feel like I could have really strengthened my thesis statement.
